

Thursday, January 10. 2008

Rory on Rails

Lately, the Ruby on Rails community has been under fire for some reason I don't fully understand. I think Slashdot made an on-going debate more public. I'm keeping the fire going for no reason at all except to fill blog space, and bore you. Ruby on Rails was created to make web application development easier to use for programmers. Except that some people come to it expecting magic and when they don't get it their little heads sort of pop. I have been picking up RoR and like it for a few specific traits and plan to use it for some projects. Currently, I am a PHP fanatic, though. Debating a programming language makes you the Commander of the Super Nerd Kingdom. Who the hell cares what you program in? I don't sit around asking people how they feel about something. I just get the project done and bank. Only a moron spends any time on a forum asking people how they feel about something. On another note, blogging about a programming language debate makes you The Lord High Chieftain Overlord of All Nerd and Geekdom. I will take my crown now, Thank You!!!

Posted by Rory Brown at 18:28